The following are tivals, interspersed with the daily and hourly the awards to Kentucky subse telegrams of the irrepressed conflict between the parties and leaders at Washington, have, until yesterday, kept up such an excitement, that we do not suppose any number of the readers of the public journals would have been in a mood to even read an account of the achievements or the applause awarded an artist, whatever were his merits. But now, since this rougher excitement on the more boisterous field is all over, we are sure that all who justly value this most admirable of the glories of their country, will be ready to sit down and read all that has been spoken and written of and concerning such a contributor to our national glory. The artist, man of seience and literature, as well as the statesman and warrior, contribute by their achievments an individual fame to the glory of the State and nation; and we feel that just at this hour there is a perceptibly strong disposition to estimate justly whatever has elevated, or promises to exalt still higher, our beloved Republic. We are suro that every reader of genuine taste will be as much interested and delighted in what concerns the citizen of this class, as in what relates to the more glaring idols of the applauding multitudes.

I had therefore to invent all, out and out. The topic, moreover, seemed to be one whereof I knew nothing, absolutely, and I might have despoire, but in running up my predictiments and topics I fell upon the category of relation, and I limin ediately determined to select and lix upon something which I did understand, and which would be a lit object for a middle term, and that I would therefore a middle term, and that I would therefore a few as the properties of the law; it could have been nothing else. It was what I had made all my other studies as a son of old Clarke—ha is an honor to use all as a Americans and a skentuckians—but to the citizen, and which would be a lit object to rate of Clarke he is especially an honor, a pride, and a pleasure will prove it. He was born in the adjoining county of Clarke, of honest, most respectable, but por promage. He was raised in porerty and interest to abor. When I first knew that I wand if a mot mistaken iteres still stants near the town of Winchester. else. It was what I had made all my other sind it tributary to, for featy years, and in which was the stand point where I had taken all my observations and lixed for nyaelf all the relations of every other object. But what was the relation here required, and how was it to be found? It was of course discovere lby running my the general, or some of them, to which scal; the belongs and thereby finding properties common to it and to law. And I would have set off in this direction. But it occurred to me to form upon the art of sculpture a class of the line and beautiful rist in which would be found some properties at once pearance it so perfectly represents. Thus it will in which would be found some properties at orce common to all the species thereof, and to the science and art of jurispranence, and which would be seen that in fifteen years he has a prung from the obscurity of a mechanic to the highest reavonce canoble and dignify the entire associations of an artist. This transition seems slow tion. I proceeded accordingly. Next to sculp, when the years occupied are alone considered, ture was of course set down pointing; it followed but when we consider the botty height he has atthat poetry had to be ad led to these; and there it was obvious that to complete the group and make up a class of things lit for the occasion, music with all its comprehensive harmony had to be embraced, and it was addel.

The question then recurred, what is the relationship of the statue of Henry Clay—appropriate stands the statue of Henry Clay—appropriate the statue of the huntile beginning and the tion between this class of arts and the law, that menuments of the huntile beginning, and the great and perveding science of all art? What is splendid consumunation of his fame. This career common to them all, or any of them? What is beautifully illustrates, what is the glory of our their unity? In what does it consist, and what country, that in this land of liberty and equaltheir unity? In what does it consist, and what are the effects thereof on each constituent species of the classes? The first rough work was soon accomplished; the sentment to be proposed was settled; but its form was not determined, nor is it yet perfected, and still less has been done in framing an expression of it in words. It shall, however, be forthcoming presently; after I have said a few words about its general characteristics. I supposed that I detected in the law and this class of these high and beautiful arts the presence, in some sense, of stacles that seemed insurmonntable, solitary and beautiful arts the prescuee, in some sense, of stacles that seemed insurmountable, solitary and what was at once the True, the Beautiful, and the Good; and that the combination or association of all was necessary to make the most perfect and highest object of the highest admiration of the human mind. I cannot retree the process which brought me to this conclusion, nor will I offer any argument to support it. I will not even guarantee that it will bear discussion. It may be found all laneiful, or a new production of another species of the old stock of learned and profund nonsense, well amonths to the err and hooking well more pareer.

sounding to the ear and looking well upon paper, but utterly incomprehensible by any or all the faculties of the human minel. There is, however, here detected the object of that powerful emotion which must excite every artist, and which, only, can be adequate to originate and impell on the continued effort required to produce a result worthy the ambition of a man of genius.

It had been supposed that the thirst for posthumous and immortal lame was this great motive the solid hat is of a pure and shotless private character.

Mr. Pre ident, allow me in conclusion to say again, that Clarke county, the county of his birth, is a glorious old county, and especially a ground in the continued effort required to produce a result worthy the ambition of a man of genius.
